SINGULAR REVELATIONS FROM THE WRECK OF the New Era.

CINGULAR REVELATIONS FROM THE WRECK OF STREAM PROMETIAN AWELL TRACERSY.

(From the New York Dispatch of Oct. 1.)

On the 13th of November has the inhabitants of the Jersey shere between Deal and Long Branch were thrown into organization of the 13th of November has the inhabitants of the Jersey shere between Deal and Long Branch were thrown into organization by the news that a large ship had run aground in the bay, and was foundering on the coast. The was soon discovered to be the New Era, a passenger vessel from Bremen. Strenuous efforts were at once made by the residents of the short to rescue the passengers. Expresses were sent off to New York, and the agents of the consiguees and underwriter spared neither pains nor expense to ofter sid; but from the position of the ship, and the time of the gale, the results were by no means preportionate to their exercions. The chief officers spared neither points of the gale, the results were by no means preportionate to their exercions. The chief officers spared neither the control of the ship, and the time of the gale, the results were by no means preportionate to their exercions. The chief officers spared to the ship, and the first spared of the ship, and the first spared overbeard, some perished of cold und exposure, many queenuabed in the endeavor to reach the shore by a winaming; in a word two hundred and fifty human creatures—men women and chief representations of the pictory of corrow was exhansed in their descriptions of the pictory of corrow was exhansed in their descriptions of the pictory of corrow was exhansed in their descriptions of the pictory of corrow was exhansed in their descriptions of the pictory of corrow was chansed in their spared to the pictory of corrow was chansed in their spared to the spared to shrik from uning—and yet, how waitable to the deals that were done on that 18th, 18th and 18th of November the coabulary of indignation. For while good and warm-beated men were driven frantic with agency and the reverse of the season that the waste of was wound round the wais of ms companies, was any systemity exhausted in his grasp.

"I guess they'll never reach this alive," said one of the party on shore.

"That chap's got pienty of fight in him yet," replied another, watching his struggles with curiosity.

"What's the odda," screamed the woman, a foul old hag, "so long as their corpose come this way? Dead or alive, it's all one to me."

"I guess the screen come them tools o' the other side!! he getting a sight out em, and we might as well be to home."

"I guess I'll signal 'em," said a tail, bony man, with a carving knife in his belt. And he put his flingers in his mouth so as to make a sort of whistle, and utered a shrill cry, which was heard far above the roaring of the storm.

It reached the ear of the eximmer. It was plain he saw the group, for he struck out with new energy. In a few minutes his features could be distinguished perfectly. They were hasgard, and his whole figure betokened terrible exhaustion.

Would he survive till he could touth bottom?

The female wrecker grew so excited as she watched them approach, that she ran into the surf and was almost carried off her legs. As high as she could stretch she waved her apron, and called and screeched in hideous tones, inviting the half-drowned couple to "stick up," and to "come this way for the love of the Vigin."

The unfortunate pair heard her well enough. The woman, whose toce was her oppanion. Her eyes stared widely, and she began for the first time, as far as they could see, to use her hands. The man has soul," said the tell wrecker, "I he ain't a golag to give us the sity siter all?"

"Hould yer tongue," replied one of the courades, "sure an't ten more current "Il land him here. "nature surface."

"Damn his soul," said the tell wrecker, "I he ain't a golag to give us the sity siter all?"

"Hould yer tongue," replied one of the courades, "sure an't ten more curre and the noder current 'il land has here thinks us, as purity as ye plase.'

A tremendous wave at this moment awept over the swimmers. To the eager wreckers an age seemed to pass before any sign of them re-appeared.

At less the womant chricked:—

At less the womant chricked:—

At less the womant chricked:—

And there the man was, certainly, his eyes half-closed, his hands motionies, rising and falling with the motion of the water. He was alone.

As the Irishman had calculated, the under current—that mysterious force which seems to impel drowned bodies in contrary directions at the same time—had driven him much closer to the land. A few feet more and he would fouch bottom.

"Jake," acreamed the woman, in a phrenzy of excitement, "get the bost hock, you murderin' hiel."

The Irishman soon provided himself with the implement in question, and while the tail man waded out as far as his long legs would let him, Pat gained the top of a boulder, towards which the drowning man was drifting. Another surf swell, and he was within reach.

"Now, Jake!" spituitered the woman.

"Turn yer head this way, my dariin'," said the Irishman, in a caxing voice, poising the boat hook, "Divil a fish 'Il ate you, my boy."

Down came the boat hook with a crash, splashing the water

Down came the boat hook with a crash, splashing the water over the wreckers, and the splashing the water over the wreckers, said Pat quietly, as he drew the body towards him, and caught a firm grasp of the shoulder.

In an instant all live were round him.
"Hurry him up," cried the tail man. "Some of them cussed chape il be down here presently. This way."
And each of them setzing a limb, and the woman the head, from which bleed flowed, showing where the boat hook had bruck, they ran with their burthen to a hollow in the rock at a stort distance from the beach. As they laid him down with no gentle hand, the half dead man opened his eyes.

"What!" cried the woman, indignantly, "you ain't qutet yet?"

"What?" cried the woman, indignantly, "you ain't quiet yet?"
And she setzed a large stone, and with three or four well directed blows upon the temple, crushed in the skuil.

"There," said the fiend with a laugh, "It that don't satisfy you there's more of the same sort letter and the same stripped of every vestige of his clothing his money was divided among the live, and the corpse, bloeding, naked and dissigned, was carried to the water's edged, and thrown down upon the sand. It was only when the job was done that one of the wreckers claimed suddenly:
"I say, where the devil's the girl!"
"Ase," replied the woman, "what became of her?"
"Drowned, may be," said the tail man, looking sharply und the shore.

'It's as good as fifteen dollars lost," grumbled the woman suikity.

"It's so much gained for the fishes," responded a wreker, playfully.

The five walked back to their place of observation; the tail main climbing as before on the ridge of rock to look out for intruders. He had not been ton seconds there, when he turned suddenly round, and cried in a smothered voice:

"By lumder, Moher Nickett, if there aim't the girl a going off with Tim O'Neale."

Sure enough, there she was. The under-current of the wave that had separated her from her companion had swept her with resistiess force that shallow water. Her struggles to gain a footing had been seen by the man called Tim O'Neale, and by torcing some brandy down her throat, he had so far restored her, that she was able to stand. She was a tail, stender girl, with very long black har, which hung in loose coils down her back; her eyes were dark, and her features were fine and deficitle. Letter she had been plain.

When the exclamation of the tail wrecker summoned his companions to the pest of observation to see her, she seemed to be struggling with him who figured as her resource.

"Going along," tred the latter, first in English, then in German, and lastly in French, at the same time specialty a firm hold contaction of the his arm, and eleavered to burry her in the direction of the his arm, and eleavered to burry her in the mand;"

"Oh! he's all right, your brother," replied her companion alkily.
"It's so much gained for the fishes," responded a wreker, direction of the high road.

"All "ground the poor girl in French, "my brother Armand!"

"Oh I he's all right, your brother," replied her companion roughly, "you'll see him it you'll only trot along."

"No, no, i know he is drowned, and my father also. Oh! let me die uoo."

And partly from exhaustion, partly from the excess of agony, the poor girl sank to the carth, and began to sob hyatelically.

"I'll be hanged if youghie," asseverated Tim O'Neal. "A pretty prece of business to let you die. "Why, you'll be an lively y prece of business to let you dee. "Why, you'll be an lively of the same of the property of the control of the same in the letter of th wrecker's, for a thousand—made Fim O'Neale war. 'Twat a dignal, a werning.

With the rapidity of lighting, he caught the slender girl in the arms, three her arces in simulate, and ran for a chung of wood in the rear. He had scareely vanished when three persons came in sight, and thurried to the spot.

'I thought you said, Jim, there was a body here," said the idler of the party.

'I'll swear I saw one drift ashore," replied the man adiressed, locking resuld.

"Those vilhanous wreckers, I'll be bound," cried an old ferreyman. Jerreyman.

It were almost better," said the first speaker, solemnly,
"to tail into their lands dead than alive,"
How often Louise Cardan—the poor French girl—may have thought so, how often side may have praced to pass out of the hands of men intoline hand of lood; how often side may have bewalled the strange fate which derilde her lather-ward, the sequot will show—which will appear in the New York Dispatch of Oct 7th.
